

Syria Needs Peaceful Solutions

The United States is edging closer to all out war in Syria. The CIA is involved in sending arms to those fighting the Assad government. One of the CIA's roles is to decide which of the many militias will get arms. U.S. media are daily building the case for war.

With over 14,000 dead already in the Syrian civil war, we all feel that something needs to be done to stop it. But is flooding the country with weapons or perhaps US soldiers a good path to follow?

We have seen the results of 'humanitarian' U.S. wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, where, as a result of war, those countries have millions dead, injured, and/or displaced, and economies in shambles.

Diplomatic solutions are desperately needed.

Current U.S. diplomatic efforts to end the civil war are greatly hampered by U.S. reluctance to work for solutions with Russia and Iran. Washington should work with all concerned countries to pressure the warring parties. Among needed steps is a comprehensive arms embargo, including sanctions against companies involved in providing weapons to the Syrian government or any opposition militia.

Syria Needs Peaceful Solutions

The United States is edging closer to all out war in Syria. The CIA is involved in sending arms to those fighting the Assad government. One of the CIA's roles is to decide which of the many militias will get arms. U.S. media are daily building the case for war.

With over 14,000 dead already in the Syrian civil war, we all feel that something needs to be done to stop it. But is flooding the country with weapons or perhaps US soldiers a good path to follow?

We have seen the results of 'humanitarian' U.S. wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, where, as a result of war, those countries have millions dead, injured, and/or displaced, and economies in shambles.

Diplomatic solutions are desperately needed.

Current U.S. diplomatic efforts to end the civil war are greatly hampered by U.S. reluctance to work for solutions with Russia and Iran. Washington should work with all concerned countries to pressure the warring parties. Among needed steps is a comprehensive arms embargo, including sanctions against companies involved in providing weapons to the Syrian government or any opposition militia.